Week 1

This week's topic was all about teamwork. In the studio, we got placed into our teams for the rest of the year and were tasked with identifying potential team challenges and how they impact the team.

Despite being someone who finds it difficult to talk with people, let alone present in front of an audience, I decided to challenge myself and offered to represent our team as its spokesperson. While I was nervous, I found myself enjoying the experience. I wondered why I had always avoided opportunities to speak up. In the future, I would like to try being more active when it comes to stepping out of my comfort zone and learning to talk to others with more confidence.

This week had everyone in our session reform teams. I was deeply disappointed at first, I had already formed a bond with my previous teammates and the thought of having to do it all over again with a different set of people overwhelmed me. I was faced with the reality that things could change in the blink of an eye, and that learning how to quickly adapt to any curveball being thrown at me is a crucial skill to obtain. Thankfully, my new team quickly clicked, and we got to have a team bonding exercise in the form of a game.

The goal of the game was to conduct a project while figuring out which person was a disruptor. In the exercise, I tried my best to figure out who the disruptor was but to no avail. I decided that the person that disagreed with the team the most was the disruptor. However, I could not be further from being wrong. My prejudice against the person I accused showed me that even if someone was not always on board with the team's decision does not mean that they wish for the worst for the team. I learned that everyone has their own way of doing things and that I should be more tolerant and open to different points of view.

Week 3

This week's studio activity was for us to come up with a unique idea to pitch to investors. In the short timeframe we were given, we struggling to come up with original ideas and I found myself not contributing to the team as much as I had hoped.

I realized that the time constraint we were given made it difficult for me to function well. This ties to how I often wait until the last minute to complete assignments. Although the pressure has helped me push through, I lately find myself exhausted easily, limiting my potential and as a result, decreasing the quality of my work. This was a wake-up call for me to manage my time better and work in small bursts rather than one big rush.

Week 4

Our team worked on the case study this week. I was tasked with the business objective and analysis sections. I was also responsible for submitting the form for our chosen topics.

When working with my group, I found it easy to communicate with one another and we were able to finish the case study rather quickly. The biggest challenge for me this week was the pressure I had as the fate our team's topic rests in my hands. Ultimately, we got our fourth pick which was not what I personally wanted which put me in a sour mood. However, after looking into the topic again, I started finding myself more interested in it. I realized that rather than quickly dismissing something I am unfamiliar with, I should first try to understand more about it. More often than not, I learn to appreciate lots of different things I otherwise would not choose myself if not for the circumstances that led to the chosen topic.

Week 5

This week's studio required our team to apply basic project management initiation procedures in a simple case study. I was tasked with brainstorming ideas with the team as well as creating the Gantt chart.

We had very little time to complete our tasks, much like in week 3. This time however, we were able to communicate more effectively, which helped us complete the tasks in time. The experience taught me that no matter how daunting a task could be, a well-coordinated team can make all the difference.
